Combating Senior Hunger
The Impacts of Hunger and Inequity

According to Feeding America’s recent study release, The State of Senior Hunger,* 5.2 million seniors aged 60 and older were food insecure in the United States in 2020. This equates to 6.8% of the nation’s senior population—the percentage increases to 8.6% in southern states. Mississippi and Alabama rank in the top 10 highest in the nation at 12.2% and 9%, respectively.

Hunger and chronic poor health can create a consequential pattern leaving individuals in a system of nutrition insecurity—which, as defined by the USDA, “emphasizes the coexistence of food insecurity and diet-related diseases and disparities.” Approximately 77% of older adults, 65 years and older, have two or more chronic health conditions, placing them at a higher risk for food insecurity.

Almost two-thirds of deaths among older adults are due to heart disease, cancer, stroke and diabetes. Yet, a good diet quality has been shown to mitigate these risks.

Feeding the Gulf Coast is contracted by the USDA to operate the Commodity Supplemental Food Program (CSFP). This program aids us in addressing senior hunger by equipping us to provide monthly food boxes of nutritional staples to registered seniors. Thanks to advocacy efforts to increase our CSFP case load, we will now be able to increase our monthly distribution to more than 3,000 seniors.

In addition to this valuable program, the food bank is working to address rural, underserved senior communities through a Healthy Food Box initiative. This opportunity will provide low-income seniors with a supply of healthy food, including no salt or low salt vegetables and beans, whole grains, proteins, and fresh produce. This food as medicine approach will help combat depression, asthma, cardiovascular disease, diabetes, and other prevalent chronic health conditions prominent in food-insecure older adults.

FROM THE PRESIDENT & CEO

Hunger has many root causes and can affect those of any age and in all walks of life. At Feeding the Gulf Coast our mission is to identify those affected by food insecurity and provide them with resources and services that best meet their nutritional needs.

Seniors experiencing food insecurity are of particular concern given many of them are on fixed incomes while facing inflation and other lingering impacts of Covid. With that in mind, we have successfully advocated for more senior commodity supplemental food boxes for our service area. We are also distributing senior disaster emergency food boxes, and we are launching a Senior Hunger initiative that will result in the distribution of food boxes and mobile pantries in areas where seniors live.

Another vulnerable population is children. Summertime means schools are out and children are ready for fun and adventure. Unfortunately, 1 in every 4 children faces food insecurity. This becomes particularly problematic when school cafeterias are closed. This is why we partner with more than 150 organizations to provide our Summer Meals Program to ensure nearly 10,000 children receive free meals each week this summer. Without this program and the wonderful partners who help Feeding the Gulf Coast distribute snacks and meals, some kids in our community would skip eating throughout the day. Together, we can help families and children not only get through the summer, but focus on what really matters—making lifelong memories of summertime adventures.

Parents and caregivers seeking meals for children can visit our website at www.feedingthegulfcoast.org, call our office at (888) 704-FOOD or text FOOD to 304304.

PRESIDENT & CEO, FEEDING THE GULF COAST

GETTING THROUGH THE SUMMER

"Being able to give the kids in our community a safe place to go during the summer and knowing that they will be receiving balanced meals is a wonderful thing. Many of our kids come from lower-income homes, and parents don’t always have the option to send healthy lunches with their kids. They know that by sending them to our program, their child will also receive lunch and a snack. Feeding the Gulf Coast has been vital to a worry-free summer where kids just have to worry about how to have fun that day.”

- Salvation Army, Pensacola, FL

Throughout the year, Feeding the Gulf Coast partners with parks and recreation sites, schools, and local community resource centers to provide meals to children in a safe location.

Hunger impacts more than 100,000 children across our gulf coast service area. For kids who count on school meals to stay healthy, summer vacation could mean three months of worry and hunger, making summer anything but a break.

“If they didn’t give out food, we wouldn’t be eating what we normally eat. Because what they give us is pretty much all we have,” says nine-year-old Iker.* “I’m a kid, but I don’t feel like one because of how much I worry about and all the responsibilities I have at home.”

As families continue to face higher prices at the grocery store and gas station, the food bank is working with community partners to ensure nearly 10,000 children receive free meals each week this summer.

Without this program and the wonderful partners who help Feeding the Gulf Coast distribute snacks and meals, some kids in our community would skip eating throughout the day. Together, we can help families and children not only get through the summer, but focus on what really matters—making lifelong memories of summertime adventures.

Pandemic-era food programs are expiring, the challenges remain.

Government assistance programs were strengthened during the pandemic to help families overcome new barriers. Many of those programs are now sunsetting, creating a gap that will threaten families’ overall wellbeing as they still work towards stability.

The food bank is not immune to the rising costs of food and transportation costs. Feeding the Gulf Coast is experiencing a more than 50% increase in transportation expenses while struggling to secure steady streams of food supply to meet our agencies’ needs.

Families and food banks are facing a perfect storm of challenges. Skyrocketing food prices have made it harder for families facing hunger to access enough to eat and have strained food pantries’ ability to continue supporting our neighbors in need.

“Hunger can be a daily burden for families and individuals struggling to make ends meet. To address this, the food bank relies on consistent support to sustain our mission and programs. Thankfully, the food bank is blessed with a strong group of committed donors who automatically sow seeds into the food bank’s mission.

Our Hope Harvester Donors give automatically on the date of their choice monthly through our recurring giving program. These donors have shared that they enjoy both the convenience of the program and also the impact they are making. Others have their own experience with food insecurity and know just how vital the food bank’s mission is to provide support within their community.

“In my life, so many people have helped me as a single mother raising two girls. When I needed help, someone always showed up. I would like to be the person showing up now in the way that I can. Hunger is real, and it is a real and personal problem for each of us who have the resources to help. It doesn’t take one person giving a lot - it takes a lot of people giving what they can. I am so grateful, in my winter years, that I can give back and show up. I’ve always been impressed with how your organization uses the resources given.”

When a disaster strikes in our service area, Feeding the Gulf Coast works to distribute food and supplies to the affected communities as quickly as possible. This requires the food bank to work ahead of storms and remain disaster-ready throughout the year, especially during the peak storm season. June 1 through November 30 marks the official hurricane season for the central Gulf Coast.
